OVERVIEW

Cutaneous adverse food reactions (CAFR) or food allergies were diagnosed up to 24% of all skin diseases with prevalence up to 62% of allergic skin diseases in dogs. The clinical signs of CAFR are indistinguishable from atopic dermatitis unless concurrent gastrointestinal signs are shown. The diagnosis of CAFR is done by strict food elimination trial using novel or hydrolysed ingredients, followed by re-introduction of original diet. This lecture will discuss the challenges in performing and interpreting the response to dietary changes as well as the common failures due to poor owner compliance and communication breakdown.
